In Romania, the homeland of Dracula and superstition, witches were pretty much spared from the medieval inquisitions that plagued most of Europe and killed 100,000 women. In fact, witchcraft here is not only alive; it's thriving, and it's even feared by politicians. There are hundreds of witches in the country, and they make and break marriages, cure diseases, cast or release people from good and evil spells, and predict the future. Supposedly, one in ten Romanians visits a witch.

Thanks for sharing such an educational video. Too bad that they still used a brain-washed disrepected label such as WITCHCRAFT. These indigenous spiritual workers are NOT evil witches but SPIRITUAL THERAPISTS working for the good of their communities and punishing evil doers. The best is they are WITCH DOCTORS and HUNTERS.

warlocks were targets for hatred and misunderstanding of their part in society and so anything that was attached to their beliefs such as animals or potions for curing ailments was destroyed, at this stage of the churches involvement Was the eradication of cats which have always been attached to paganism and witchcraft because of this the black plague occurred because no cats to kill the rats and the pagan calendar was a much better calendar than the Roman calendar that we use today it was more accurate .

Maybe the world may have been different world today

Romanian is a Romance language. The Romance languages all developed from Vulgar (Common) Latin and include: Italian, French, Portuguese, Spanish and Catalan. Languages are categorized on their genetic relationships, NOT the vocabulary. The genetic relationship is seen in the grammar and syntax. English is a GERMANIC language, but the vocabulary has been heavily influenced French and Latin, over 50% as a matter fact. Because England was invaded by France and that is how a lot of French vocabulary became part of English, for example: the word "pigeon" in Old French is "pigon", for an example of Latin you just need to look at the prefix "bi" meaning two as in "bicycle" because a bicycle has two wheels.

It's just my opinion, but I believe that no human being is so superior that they know with certainty whether science or something beyond our understanding controls our universe. I don't believe in witchcraft but I don't doubt the possibility. Same with god. I also recognize that this is JUST MY OPINION and I could be WRONG. I could be wrongly judging you (because I'm a random internet person and the internet does that), but please don't force or demand your belief's onto others. To put things simply, it's cringy.

I am Romanian and I can confirm this is not true. Yes, we have a very rich folklore and witchcraft is part of it but most of the rituals presented above are not Romanian but brought to us by the monad gypsies. Romanian rituals are more nature orientated and originate from the Geto-Dacian people that lived on now Romanian grounds before the Roman Empire Invasion.

I've been around witches my entire life. As a kid, I didn't even know if I was talking to an actual person, or the spirit of a person, or understand the difference (why nobody else could understand things like I did) for that matter, and I've come to see all witches as owned in worship by blood thirsty entities that speak in half-truths with agendas that span the generations. Witches are in fact very weak minded, yet stubborn, individuals that can't really think for themselves. I've seen them (or the further abuse victims, and they really do get on on suffering, in fact, kindness hurts them. They are covert sadist narcissists that wish to assume the role of god in our lives, playing the part of saints. They will use your 3rd eye to judge and harass you via psychic attacks because, guess what, they can't relate with any of the sh!t in your head and they want to scramble you, take complete control, because, guess what, they're not God, and we live, they sleep, but only if we can keep it that way, taking those that do worship in esoteric blood sacrifices out of positions of power in society, and not joining in on their occult culture. Too many people sell out. They've gotten everyone I've ever known to shun me. Everyone is weak at heart.

I am a pagan that practices witchcraft and have been for the past 5 years. my mother practiced voodoo and only used her magick to harm and do her bid. So yes there are dark witches out there. but not all of witchcraft is meant to be evil or to be the work of the devil. I practice white magick to help heal and I always ask permission to help a friend before I do anything in spell castings and blessings. but I also use black magick to protect my loved ones. Just like a non magickal believer would do to protect their loved ones. That dose not make me or any other witch a sadistic hellion. And it's not right for anyone to judge another person based on their religion, or any aspect of their being. Witches most of all . For good or for bad. all witches know to ever mind the law of three.

My reality entirely comports with empirical testability -- and, in fact, that's rather how I define reality. In simpler terms, it's model-dependent realism. Because we've learned DIFFERENT facts is entirely irrelevant. You might have learned who invented wooden-keys and I might have learned how a sorting algorithm works, and guess what -- reality doesn't change because of those NOR does perspective change because our perspective depends on how we evaluate overlapping observations based on RELEVANT knowledge.

I really like the presenter's voice. For lack of a better way of describing what it inspires in me, there's a kind of cheeky, mischievous, childlike quality to it. She'd be a wonderful narrator to a children's film or a sophisticated film about witches, witchcraft, she's just got a really nice tone to her voice. Mhm.

Gypsies are a nomad population by definition that have been travelling for centuries. Every curse corrupts your heart. Every wicked heart is cursed and every curse makes the heart evil. You can not choose light and dark. You either are with evil or with god. Jesus came as the son of god and taught us to pray, love and forgive even our enemies. Those are the laws. When we do not follow them we fall away from god. Only "Those pure in heart will see god"

Wheat and Tares I respect your opinion, but it's really disrespectful you trying to force your beliefs on other people. Those are YOUR beliefs. Beliefs arent just beliefs but there are true laws ingrained in this universe based ultimately on a scientific basis. Me choosing something to believe in does not make it true. When I jump off the roof I am bound by physical laws just as we are bound by spiritual laws.

Except it's not? This video makes it sound like magic is this mainstream thing in Romania when it's... not? Look, as a Romanian I admit that Romanians might be stupid as a whole, but such ancient, archaic traditions are not part of our society. Very few people believe or go to these Romani witches. Most people here, numerically speaking, are Orthodox Christians and the dogma of the church forbids any kind of magic, saying it is derived from the Devil. This video is very misleading

I'm so sick and tired of all the offended Romanians in the comments section who are trying to explain the women in the video "are not Romanian, they're gypsies", like it's a serious insult brought on us by foreigners who confuse Romanians with gypsies. Yes, gypsies have a different ethnic background than us, but they have been living here for hundreds of years now, so I think it's pretty accurate to call them Romanians, because at the end of the day they are Romanian citizens and they are our brothers, whether you like it or not! And if racist/xenophobic/ignorant foreigners don't want to take the time to learn about us before they speak about us, that's on them, we don't have to prove anything to them. I don't know about Russian (I mean, meaby the inflection could be quite similar?) but as an Italian I can tell you that when I heard them speakig, I thought some words sounded pretty much alike, but that's because both Italian and Romanian come from Vulgar Latin (just like Spanish, Franch, Portuguese and a few others). They're called Romance languages.

p.s. sorry if there are some mistakes, I don't speak English too well.

Digna Montero It is a Latin based language and it is part of the Romance language family! So yeah, some words will be very similar if not identical! Other than that Romanian was influenced by different cultures that ruled over it for some time/were neighbors so there's a pinch of Russian influence, Turkish and Central European :) Hope that helped!

But they are too dumb to understand or do something right.

The black africans for example.

When they were ruled by white africans, they were pretty powerful and prosperous.

Now, almost every single black african country is shit.

Except South Africa with a pop. of over 10-20% whites.

I've always found it so odd that people in the west seem to have this weird vibe over eating meat and hunting. For someone who's spent a lot of time in East and Northern Africa, the idea of someone hunting their own meat is really common. People value animals differently. One area may see dogs as pets and friends. Another area may see dogs as hunters and help round up sheep. And another area are fearful of dogs because they carry disease and are known to attack children.

Just like in the video where the woman is taking the life of the chicken. It's not the fact that she doesn't value that life of the animal, she does that's why it's a heavily influencing the ritual. I've got nothing against vegans or vegetarian. I'm deathly allergic to wheat and eggs so vegan options are usually what I got for. But I'm not ignorant to other peoples cultures and experience. But I guess it's hard to believe that other countries don't a "vegan option".

Living in agriculture societies that depend on animals for survival, they are more concerned over maintaining the lives of their communities rather the sake of animals "feels".

So when I see people looking at other people's cultures and say "how dare they consume meat", is absolutely ridiculous. What the hell do you expect?? Are you shocked that people eat differently than you?

This is why vegans have the reputation that they have, they demand people to cater to their diet option but then they turn around and judged people for drinking a glass of milk? I understand living in developed countries where food is mass produced and you really don't know what your eating. +a d r i a n a h Hey man :) while I think you touch on a very valid point that those who are impoverish are too busy working their many jobs and are primarily concerned just about getting by to be caring about the harmful impact their choices may be making, in dollar terms plant protein is certainly cheaper and healthier than animal protein. It is really staggering to me that the idea you hold is quite a popular one; when one logically considers how resource intensive animals are to farm, clearly nonprocessed vegan foods especially grains which are packed with nutrition, it far cheaper than one including animal products. To give you an example, it takes 7-16kg of plants per kg of beef https://books.google.nl/books?id=YVXfAQAAQBAJ&pg=PA101&lpg=PA101&dq=16kg+of+grain+to+feed+1kg+beef&source=bl&ots=HWm8XAv89b&sig=tfvBxL910cTbIABSemzzkxa8p3w&hl=en&sa=X&redir_esc=y#v=onepage&q=16kg%20of%20grain%20to%20feed%201kg%20beef&f=false . Livestock are also the biggest land users in the world, then we must consider their water consumption, the cost of cooling the very perishable flesh, and give you either heart disease, brain disease, liver disease, kidney disease, diabetes, stroke, cancer, parkinsons disease etc...

So I spend only NZD$35 per week on food, which is USD$25. I eat a lot of beans($4-$7 per kg dried, which triple in weight when cooked, brown rice ($2/kg dry), flax seeds ($4/kg), oils, dried fruit ($8/kg) and farmer market fruit and vege ranging from $0.50/kg and $4/kg, but mostly under $2/kg as a rule (with a few exceptions like mushrooms or ginger). On top of that I supplement with fortified soy milk which is $2.20/kg (which is more $$ than dairy milk but full of more nutrients), B12 tablets which is $0.01 per day, Vitamin D when i haven't seen the sun which again is maybe a couple cents a day. I do this not cause I can't afford to spend more, but I want to set an example of how cheap healthy veganism is, plus I enjoy the food. Alternatively, a vegan could be spending ridiculous amounts for mock meats, cheeses, yoghurt, icecream, processed snacks, and other not-so-healthy options.

I am only aware of irritable bowel syndrome meaning that perhaps in some particular cases people would be limited by the plant products they could eat, such as legumes which I consider essential for a healthy vegan diet. Could you please inform me of any other cases where health would get in the way of being vegan? Cheers, peace.

Zabel Connor 5 months ago

+Yettie_Monster That is a very respectable response and I appreciate your perspective. I actually made the move to vegan after seeing some other cultural perspectives on the lives of animals, in particular when I was in Morocco, Islam believe that animals are placed on earth to serve humans, and out of pure rejection for this perspective I guess I took the opposite "extreme". It is interesting to me that you choose to morally accept a cultural norm just because it exists, i choose to be more critical and I don't think that makes me ignorant. For example, as I presume you know, for Jewish Israelis, it is a ritual to circumcise a baby. It is very wrong to me for the family to impose their want to permanently mutilate that boy's body without them being of age to consent - what is your opinion here?

Show less

Zabel Connor 5 months ago

Skip navigation+Yettie_Monster I was reading some of your later responses to Cass Ls. You seem to think that impoverish countries would have more access to things like meat and dairy over plant products. You will find it to be the other way around, like I explained in another earlier comment, animal products are very resource intensive and more expensive. If you take for example impoverish African countries (especially before the 1940's), they primarily eat grains such as oats, wheat, legumes, seeds, nuts. When there is a special event, meat is a delicacy, seen as a family bonding activity.

red to people who struggle to get food, more people would be getting red. Some food for thought ;)

Military men have the privilege of having rations imported to their bases, plus their situation is only temporary, and they know this. If you put a vegan who is from a more economically developed western country into a scenario where it is impossible to follow a vegan diet, you can bet that they will eventually have to start hunting to survive, unless they intend to die. In certain parts of the world where food is scarce, and they don't have the privilege of choice, they have to make do with what resources they have available to them.

+good vibes We can't live off of vegetables alone, and it's really not realistic to think our entire population would do that. Eating meat is in our DNA, it's been that way since the beginning of time. Though I disagree with slaughterhouses, and think that we as a species are now at a point where we are going overboard with the enslavement of animals for their resources, we have an unfair advantage, with that I agree. I think an interesting thing to implement would be that you can only eat meat if you go and hunt it yourself, and you aren't allowed a gun. And there has to be a limit, so that people don't go crazy and kill all the animals in sight. I don't know about farm animals such as cows though, they have pretty much been bred into domestication and I doubt they would survive in the wild long.

Aurora Lara we are frugivores humans evolved to eat fruits and starchy root vegetables. it is absolutely not in our DNA to eat meat and the fact that we can get diverticulitis from over consumption is proof of that. the fact that you need to cook meat furthers my point. a true carnivore will digest meat raw with no problem. humans are herbivores that are smart enough to eat meat if necessary. chimpanzees are the same way. there is no such thing as an "omnivore" just an opportunistic herbivore.

first book I ever read, Mao's Last Dancer, where a Chinese boy to a very poor family would always complain about only ever having yams to eat, and that on special celebrations, the parents would sacrifice eating so that the children could eat meat, instead of them all eating yams. Root vege are very common staples.

+Aurora Lara Your convo has come to an end, but I feel like it is pretty important to point out that plants aren't just vegetables like you seems to continuously insinuate. there are herbs, pulses, legumes, lentils, nuts, seeds, grains. Humans are non-requisite omnivores. We thrive from a plant-based diet, but have the flexibility to eat animal products where conditions could mean plants are scarce. Preserved ancient human faeces shows us we primarily ate tuberous root vege due to the very high fibre presence, whilst meat and eggs do not provide fibre and mustn't have been as prevailing of a food than most people (ie you) assume. I suppose in a sense that being omnivorous is in our DNA; for example, milk contains lactose and mammals have an enzyme called lactase to digest lactose. When the child stops receiving milk, the expression of this enzyme is turned off. However, in some human populations (most East Asian's excluded) this enzyme remains active through adulthood, which is referred to as lactase persistence. This is thought to be an adaptation to the habit of drinking milk from domesticated animals. Though this in no way means that it is essential nor even healthy to consume milk from other species. It is a logical fallacy to say that whatever humans used to do is what is best, following that logic there would be no progression in civilisation, we wouldn't have modern medicine, we would die from unhygienic foods, be butchering every human we encountered.

+Zabel Connor Well, I watched a documentary where some people from an African tribe had to walk for weeks through a dry wasteland, where there were no plants for the entire duration of that season until it became Spring, and even during Spring the land was pretty barren. The reason bushmeat is a commodity in such countries is because food is scarce, the climate in certain parts of the world is not accommodating enough for the growth of plants or vegetation. So what are they to eat during dry months? Plants? Where are they supposed to get these plants from, conjure them up out of thin air? I'm not sure what else you're talking about, but my only point is that for some, being vegan/vegetarian is simply not an option, and I have yet to be proven wrong.

+Aurora Lara So, the original comment which sparked this conversation about the impoverish not having the option to being vegan was as such:

"Zabel Connor we understand that you're vegan, but shut the fuck up about it, ok? not all people are wealthy enough, or simply cannot be vegan because of health problems."

Which was weird because I never made that point, I simply made the comment that from an objective perspective eating animal flesh is barbaric, and they just assumed that meant I thought every person that exists is obliged to be vegan. They also made the implication that one should assume all those in impoverished nations typically don't have much plant food options available, which I explained in general is not the case, also highlighting how if they are concerned for starving people, that avoiding meat will help them. There are going to be obscure situations in which being vegan is not a possibility, but that doesn't represent the state of many and therefore it feels irrelevant to bring up as a point because "impoverish nation" does not just mean a small niche of the genre of impoverish nations which live in inhabitable places like the desert.

I hold the opinion that Good Vibes already said:

"obviously if your in a life or death situation you will do what you have to do [and eat flesh],"

But is that an argument for why somebody who has the privilege of the internet or the people in this doco shouldn't be vegan? No. Therefore, it makes zero sense that that be brought up when people are talking about how i see the pointless murder of the chicken in this video.

So either do something about it, or shut up. Simple as really. And also, the very first comment I replied to in this thread was implying that everyone should be vegan, which is why I brought up the argument that not necessarily everybody has the privilege to live that lifestyle. My original comment wasn't even directed towards you, so I don't know why you're butting in and telling me that what I'm saying is irrelevant, when it wasn't even directed at you.

From my perspective I saw you made some poor assumptions and hold opinions which are illogical and should be changed, and me expressing these thoughts is in no way worth condemnation. In the same way that a person does not only rally/protest if they expect a change in return, rather that standing up for a principal and showing solidarity can be the objective. I have a purpose in giving my 2 cents on an ONLINE FORUM which doesn't have to be making a change. However, you would be really wrong in saying I haven't made a change, I have certainly been a part of several people's journey to being consistent with their values, specifically vegetarianism and veganism.

Not by talking online do I have a moral high ground, but by being vegan and making other efforts in my life, I realise that I am closer to the values that I hold. Of course I sleep better because I adhere to upholding a standard of justice. Shouldn't being a moral person be idealised and encouraged? Why do you not aim to be a moral person?

And to ask me why I don't aim to be a moral person implies that one cannot be a moral person if they eat meat, well what about those people I mention who have no choice but to eat meat to survive? +Aurora Lara Nonono, I was simply pointing out how absurd it is to twist trying to be moral into an insult, like you did to me
 "Acting as if you're on moral high ground may help you sleep at night, but that's as far as it goes I'm afraid."
 I'm not calling you immoral.

don't want to eat meat? :

So the point is, conditions in which it isn't possible to be vegan are so scarce that bringing it up to justify this statement:

"we understand that you're vegan, but shut the fuck up about it, ok? not all people are wealthy enough, or simply cannot be vegan because of health problems", means that you think the idea of veganism shouldn't be discussed because there is a 1% (arbitrary percentage) human population which cannot be vegan. So what if there are a few people who can't be vegan, what point is that making? I'm not trying to prove you wrong about anything, for a while I have only been trying to emphasise the irrelevance of how a minute community has anything to do with veganism.

Show less

Reply •

Aurora Lara 4 months ago

If you took that as an insult, then you must not get insulted often. Yes I would like to cut meat out of my diet, but not for "moral" reasons, though I do feel bad for animals who find themselves on the receiving end of human violence.

"So the point is, conditions in which it isn't possible to be vegan are so scarce" If you were able to PROVE that statement with evidence and sources to back it up, then maybe I'd believe you.

And to be honest I didn't suggest that veganism shouldn't be discussed because of that APPARENT "%1", "minute" community of people. I am not saying it shouldn't be discussed at all, I'm saying that the average person doesn't care, and sees people like you as a joke who cannot be taken seriously, especially when you go on long winded rants such as the ones in this thread. You people have conjured up a negative image for yourselves, if you want to "convert" people, then perhaps you should work on your image first, and then find another way to be more effective. If anything you put people off.

There is no such thing as meat without violence.

Logically, why would people inhabit uninhabitable locations which were completely barren like you described as such:

"Well, I watched a documentary where some people from an African tribe had to walk for weeks through a dry wasteland, where there were no plants for the entire duration of that season until it became Spring, and even during Spring the land was pretty barren." - these are the scarce circumstances in which people can't be vegan, surely you don't believe this to be common?

When a place begins to get rid of plants, all life in that place becomes rid, because there is nothing for those animals at the bottom of the foodchain to eat. Humans can't sustainably survive off plants nor animals in barren habitats which is why it is an uncommon circumstance.

It is really difficult to engage in a conversation with you because you constantly contradict things you have previously said or you lose the context of what I am responding to (things you have said) and thus misunderstand what I am talking about and make poor assumptions about what I am saying. So I can't engage with you any further, it is tiring to have to repeat myself and receive irrelevant feedback. And then on top of that get your senseless generalisations thrown at me because you want to divert the conversation from an intelligent one into pitting a war against people who live selfless lifestyles. Think for yourself and don't let the toxic internet lead to you believe vegans are on a different side to you. Don't perpetuate this imaginary war.

Skip navigationHey if you guys want to be vegan then go ahead, if other people want to eat meat then let them, even if you think it's not right. People who consume meat prefer to have meat rather than an all vegan diet. There's no point in arguing like this, some people will continue to consume meat and others will continue their vegan diet. Let's be more open and continue on with our lives. Let's not bash people for consuming meat and let's not bash people for having a vegan diet, we live on the same earth so we gotta try and get along. Treat each other good, don't purposefully avoid a conflict then choose the path which can result in the most peaceful outcome. I know this is sappy and cheesy af but you know it's correct, it's your opinion if you think eating meat is immoral but there are better ways of putting out your opinion, leave room for another person's opinion after you've stated yours and if the other person doesn't reciprocate maybe it's best to leave them with their opinion. Let's all try to be the better person, healthy debating is good but don't make it a competition to put down another person's opinion unless it'll harm you as a person and your human rights. It is their right to consume meat and it is a vegan's right to consume vegetation. If anybody is threatening you or your human rights then it is a cause for attention but if not then let's try to settle any type of disagreement with an open mind to all opinions and tastes. I thought I'd give a little advice, I am in no way trying to continue a dispute or start one for that matter, I just thought I'd put in my opinion is all. You are free to disagree and to agree, whatever you choose to believe is entirely your business and I will not meddle with it ^3^

process would be cutting of the meat production slowly (not raising more cows, pigs, etc) till there numbers are low, and then just leting them be or i don't know, because it may affect the ecosystem. But yes, if we didn't had to feed cattle all those veggies and grains would be enough for all the world, that without counting all the damage that raising cattle does to the planet bc it increase the global warming.

Yes, you can find all the protein you need from a vegan diet but you are depriving your body from what it wants- meat. Meat has protein that's a plant could never give you. So yes you can live on a vegan diet but it is unnatural. □

Alexandru Nan Ernest They look like similar to normal Romanian people too.. I guess those witches mixed with Romanians.. Anyway, there are many mixed people between gypsy and Romanian.. And to be honest many Romanian also believe and like to go to this witchcraft.. So Why complain?

There is no any ethnic better than others in this world.. It sounds very arrogant if you think you are better than them.. Anyway, those witches were born, grew up and speak mother tongue on your own same language..

Why complain? Just accept them as the part of your life.. Or you can try ask them to do DNA Test if they have similarity genetic with Romanians blood.. I believe those witches are also Romanians.. At least MIXED.. And thats the traditions since long time.. Why ignore it?

Romanians and gypsies almost never mixed in the past... and it was because of gypsies, because their culture doesn't allow them to marry outside of their ethnicity. they marry really young, from around 13 (even in 2016), they don't pick their marriage partner - the parents are the ones to decide, and they never decide to marry their kids with romanians, or other ethnicity. Gypsies actually kept their own language and speak it. romanian is like a second language. most of them refuse to send their kids to school, pay taxes or adapt in the society. Romanians accept the different. About the DNA test....it will only tell you that gypsies come from india, something you can learn easily if you do a google search. They came to more countries in east europe, not only romania. Since they don't really mix with others, i guess their race is still quite pure. If they would have mixed, they would have integrated in those countries and not remain a different ethnicity. And about witches...of course there are romanian witches as well as gypsy witches and maybe even some mixed ones, but really rare i believe - their parents' only reason to marry would be because their families both practice witchcraft. Not everyone says the spell the same way, but i believe it's not the words that matter, but the energy the witch is putting in those words. there are witches, shamans and priests everywhere in the world and in every culture. they all do the same thing....collect a lot of universal energy using rituals and then use it for good, or bad.

but there are people who identity as "witches " who absolutely refuse to do evil ("white witches") and those who do it almost solely for healing ("green witches" commonly found in variations of voodoo despite prevailing stereotypes)
